ABSTRACT

Findings of a study that examined the effectiveness of Alaska's Public Employment Relations Act (PERA) on labor relations between school employees and local school districts are presented in this report. Methodology involved: (1) document analysis; (2) interviews with members of professional organizations, district administrators, presidents and members of local teachers' unions and support personnel negotiating teams, and the hearing examiner of the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA); and (3) a survey of the presidents of local NEA-affiliated unions and 51 district superintendents. The survey elicited a 75 percent district response rate. Background information on the organization and function of the ALRA and state labor legislation are also presented. Findings indicate that the length of negotiation time, legal service costs, and use of professional negotiators have remained unchanged. However, much uncertainty exists about what issues can be negotiated in collective bargaining. Recommendations are made to continue coverage of public school employees under PERA provisions and for passing legislation to clarify negotiable issues. One table is included. Appendices contain the survey findings and agency responses. (LMI)

LEGISLATIVE BUDGET AND AUDIT COMMITTEE

DIVISION OF LEGISLATIVE AUDIT

The Legislative Budget and Audit Committee is a permanent interim committee of the Alaska Legislature. The bipartisan committee is made up of five senators and five representatives, with one alternate from each legislative chamber. The chairmanship of the committee alternates between the two chambers every legislature.

The committee is responsible for providing the legislature with audits of state government agencies. The programs and activities of state government now cost more than $4 billion a year. As legislators and administrators try increasingly to allocate state revenues effectively and make government work more efficiently, they need information to evaluate the work of governmental agencies. The audit work performed by the Division of Legislative Audit helps provide that information.

As a guide to all their work, the Division of Legislative Audit complies with generally accepted auditing standards established by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants and with government auditing standards established by the U.S. General Accounting Office.

Audits are performed at the direction of the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee. Individual legislators or committees can submit requests for audits of specific programs or agencies to the committee for consideration. Copies of all completed audits are available from the Division of Legislative Audit's offices in either Anchorage or Juneau.

In accordance with the provisions of Title 24 of the Alaska Statutes, the attached report is submitted for your review.

A Report on the Impact of the Public Employment Relations Act on Local School Districts

November 8, 1991

Audit Control Number

05-4419-92

The audit reports on the impact that Chapter 180, SLA 1990 has had on labor relations between school employees and the State's local school districts. This legislation made public school employees subject to the provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), AS 23.40, Article 2. The legislation also classified public school employees as (a)(3) workers under AS 23.40.200 which gave the school employees the legal right to strike. This was a right that they had previously not been granted.

The audit was conducted in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards. We recommend in the report that legislation be passed that will continue to classify public school employees as (a)(3) employees under AS 23.40.200 and that they continue to be subject to the other provisions of PERA. We also recommend that the legislature consider passing legislation to clearly establish what items are negotiable between school district administrators and their employees. A further statement of our audit approach is included in the Objectives, Scope, and Methodology section of this report.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

OBJECTIVES, SCOPE, AND METHODOLOGY

In accordance with a Legislative Budget and Audit Committee special request and the provisions of Title 24 of the Alaska Statutes, we conducted a review of the effects of Chapter 180, SLA 1990 (Senate Bill 15) on the State's local school districts. This legislation made public school employees subject to the provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), AS 23.40, Article 2. Public school employees were classified as (a)(3) workers. Under PERA, class (a)(3) employees are given the legal right to strike; whereas, previously when public school employees were covered by Title 14, the Alaska Supreme Court determined that they had no legal right to strike.

Objectives

The objective of the review was to gain an understanding of the effects of Chapter 180, SLA 1990 on labor relations between public school employees and their respective school districts. Specific objectives of the review were to:

1. Determine how the legislation affected the length of time needed to reach a negotiated settlement compared to negotiations conducted under Title 14.

2. Determine if there has been an increase in the costs of attorneys or other legal costs attributable to negotiations under PERA.

3. Determine whether under PERA there has been an increased cost to school districts attributable to contract negotiations.

4. Compare the settlement process between school districts and employees under Title 14 with PERA.

5. Assess the involvement of the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA) with public school employees and school districts.

6. Review and report on the number and content of Unfair Labor Practice (ULP) filings submitted to ALRA.

7. Report on the effect of PERA classification on the general attitudes of both labor and management towards each other during the negotiations process.

Scope

We focused our examination of education employee labor relations on the 54 school districts established in the State of Alaska. In our review, we placed additional emphasis on larger districts that have negotiated agreements or are currently negotiating under the provisions of PERA.

Methodology

Our evaluation of the effects of Chapter 180, SLA 1990 involved review and analysis of the following documents:

1. Alaska Statute 14.20, Article 6. Negotiation and Mediation.

2. Alaska Statute 23.40, Article 2. Public Employment Relations Act.

3. Information pertaining to 1989's Senate Bill 15 which eventually was passed as Chapter 180, SLA 1990, an act "Including, for two years, public school employees in the Public Employment Relations Act as class (a)(3) employees entitled to a right to strike; requiring advisory arbitration before public school employees exercise the right to strike; and providing for an effective date."

4. Information pertaining to 1988's House Bill 170 which eventually was passed as Chapter 95, SLA 1988, an act "Extending collective bargaining rights to noncertificated school district employees."

5. The Alaska Supreme Court decision regarding Kenai Peninsula Borough School District v. Kenai Peninsula Education Association, 572 P.2d 416 (Alaska 1977).

6. The Alaska Supreme Court decision regarding Anchorage Education Association v. Anchorage School District, 648 P.2d 993 (Alaska 1982).

7. Executive Order No. 77.

8. ALRA's 1990 Annual Report.

9. ALRA's ULP Case Management File.

10. ALRA's ULP Case Status Report.

11. Public Case Files at ALRA on filed education cases.

We also relied extensively on interviews with the following groups of individuals:

1. Organizations with an interest in education matters, which included the Alaska Association of School Boards (AASB), the Alaska Council of School Administrators (ACSA), and the National Education Association (NEA).

2. School district administrators, which included superintendents, personnel directors, and labor relations directors.

3. Presidents and members of negotiating teams for local teachers' unions.

4. Presidents and members of negotiating teams for local education support personnel unions.

5. ALRA's hearing examiner/administrator.

We prepared a questionnaire regarding the effects of placing public school employees under the provisions of PERA, which was mailed out to the presidents of local NEA-affiliated unions.

We also prepared a questionnaire regarding the effects of placing teachers under the provisions of PERA, which was mailed to the superintendents of 51 of the State's school districts. Because the questionnaire was designed based on their discussions, we did not mail the questionnaire to the superintendents of the three school districts we had interviewed in the survey phase of our audit work.

ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTION

Title 14 of the Alaska Statutes sets out the duties and organization of the Department of Education. The statutes establish a seven-member State Board of Education appointed by the Governor, which sets the policy for education in Alaska's public schools. The State Board appoints the Commissioner of the Department of Education to implement and carry out its policy decisions.

There are 471 public schools administered by 54 school districts in Alaska. The school districts include 21 Regional Education Attendance Areas (REAAs) and 33 City and Boroughs. The REAAs are created in politically unorganized areas in rural Alaska and the city and borough school districts serve politically-organized areas of the State.

Alaska education highly emphasizes the importance of local control. Each school district has a locally elected school board that works within the state guidelines to set policies for their respective districts. In 1990, there were about 108,000 students attending public school between preschool and twelfth grade. These students were taught by about 6,400 public school teachers.

Teachers and other school personnel were placed under Title 14 eighteen years apart

Certificated public school employees were given the right to bargain matters pertaining to their employment and the fulfillment of their professional duties in 1970. Chapter 18, SLA 1970 codified laws relating to school district labor relations under AS 14.20, Article 6 (commonly referred to as Title 14). Noncertificated public school employees were given the right to bargain matters of wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment in 1988 (Chapter 95, SLA 1988) when AS 14.20, Article 6 was amended.

In 1990 (Chapter 180, SLA 1990) public school employees were placed, for a two-year period, under the provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA) as class (a)(3) employees. An important aspect of labor relations under PERA is the role of the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA).

ALRA acts as referee and adjudicator for public employee labor relations

The present organization of ALRA was created on July 1, 1990 after the governor issued and the legislature approved Executive Order 77. The order consolidated three separate agencies into ALRA responsible for administering PERA and the Railroad Corporation Act. ALRA is composed of a board of three members who serve staggered three-year terms. The governor appoints and the legislature confirms the board members. No more than two board members may be from a single political party and all must have backgrounds in labor relations. One member is drawn from management, one from labor, and one from the general public.

ALRA employs a small staff of hearing officers and examiners to process and review various allegations and petitions within its jurisdiction. Perhaps the most visible aspect of ALRA's responsibilities is its resolution and adjudication of unfair labor practices (ULP).

The ALRA's process for resolving ULPs is as follows:

1. Preliminary review of allegation. The party filing a charge lays the issue out to a hearing officer/investigator. The hearing officer fills out a checklist to determine that all requirements for a charge have been met. Requirements include that the charge is sworn, that there are written addresses for the parties to the charge, and that the charge is dated. The hearing officer has 14 days to conduct an investigation, but in actuality it has been taking longer than 14 days.

2. Determination of jurisdiction. If the facts alleged appear to be true, then ALRA must decide if it has jurisdiction to hear the case. If it is determined that ALRA has jurisdiction, the facts of the charge are again examined prior to contacting witnesses on both sides. The hearing officer then forwards the case to the hearing examiner with a recommendation to dismiss or hear the case.

3. Informal Mediation or Resolution. If it is decided to hear the case, the hearing examiner attempts to bring the two parties together to have them conciliate the issues that separate them.

4. Hearing is held. If conciliation is not possible, then a hearing is held. An audio tape and written testimony is kept of each hearing. The case may be heard either by the ALRA's hearing examiner or the ALRA board may choose to hear the case as a board. When the board chooses to not be present at the hearing, the hearing examiner prepares a proposed decision for the board. When comments are received back from each board member and an agreement is reached on the wording of the decision, it becomes final. The final decision is written and is appealable in court.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

1970 legislation first defined labor rights for teachers

In 1970, the terms and conditions by which teachers could collectively bargain were first established by the legislature in AS 14.20, Article 6. The statute sets out the negotiation and mediation processes to be followed for teachers (called certificated employees). Specifically, AS 14.20.550 requires that

> Each city, borough and regional school board, shall negotiate with its certificated employees in good faith on matters pertaining to their employment and the fulfillment of their professional duties.

AS 14.20, Article 6 also set out procedures for school boards to follow in recognizing organizations to bargain on behalf of teachers (the statute refers to these organizations as bargaining agencies).

Noncertificated public school employees joined teachers in obtaining the right to bargain conditions of their employment in 1988, with the passage of Chapter 95, SLA 1988. This legislation amended AS 14.20, Article 6 to include noncertificated public school employees. Noncertificated employees were allowed to bargain matters of wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

A Short Glossary of Terms Used in This Report

Advisory arbitration: An independent third party is called in to help settle a collective bargaining deadlock. After hearing both sides of the dispute, the arbitrator issues an advisory decision. Although the decision is not binding on either of the two sides, it often brings a realistic perspective to the negotiations.

Binding arbitration: As in advisory arbitration, a third party hears both sides, but then renders a decision that is binding on both parties.

Mediation: Involves third party intervention between conflicting parties. However, a mediator acts more informally than an arbitrator, often serving as a go-between for the two sides in order to promote reconciliation or compromise.

Deadlock: Point at which negotiations between two parties reaches a standstill. Often a mediator is brought in at this point to help the two sides to continue communicating and to mutually resolve differences.

Impasse: Point at which negotiations have broken down to the point that neither side to a dispute will concede on their issues. Impasse exists after a mediator and an advisory arbitrator have tried to resolve issues.

Title 14 sets out procedure for union recognition and certification

The statutes required school boards to conduct secret ballot elections to select union representation for teachers. The school boards had to hold an election if 25% of the district's teachers so requested. After such an election, the statute required school boards to recognize the union with the most votes.

After recognition, school boards were required to negotiate within 20 days after receiving a written request from the union. Negotiation meetings were required to be open to the public unless both sides mutually agreed to have the meetings closed.

1970 legislation also provided for mediation then arbitration

The statute required mediation, in a prescribed manner, of labor negotiations if and when the two sides reached a deadlock. The United States Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would serve as the agency to resolve the dispute. The mediator would chair the mediation meetings and attempt to resolve the differences between the two sides. The mediator would prepare a written report, which would be issued to both sides. If either side rejected the report in its entirety, the mediator could make changes and prepare a final report. If either side rejected that final report, the governor could appoint an advisory arbitrator to hear the issues.

The statute also required that negotiated agreements provide for a grievance procedure. When setting up a grievance procedure, the statute required that binding arbitration be used as the final procedural step. The statute did maintain that it was not designed to abrogate school boards' rights to have final decision-making authority on policy.

1972 legislation sets out public employee labor relations rights

Two years after teachers were given the right to bargain, public employees had their rights codified in AS 23.40, Article 2. The legislation, referred to as the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), established three classes of public employees and gave specific bargaining rights to each class.

Class (a)(1) employees include police and fire protection employees and were designated as workers whose services cannot be suspended for any length of time. Class (a)(1) employees are not allowed to strike. However, if impasse is reached in negotiations even after mediation, then the bargaining parties must submit to binding arbitration.

Class (a)(2) employees, which include public school employees other than teachers or noncertificated employees, and public utility employees, were designated as workers whose services could be suspended for short intervals. Class (a)(2) employees are allowed to engage in a strike after unsuccessful mediation. But if either the employer or the State's labor relations agency can prove that the strike threatens health, safety, or the public welfare, they can apply for a court order to stop the strike. If the impasse continues after the suspended strike, the parties must submit to binding arbitration.

Class (a)(3) employees are those employees not specifically included in the two previous groups. Class (a)(3) employees are allowed to engage in a strike if a majority of the bargaining unit votes to do so by secret ballot.

PERA rights differ significantly from Title 14 provisions

The rights conveyed to employees covered by PERA differed significantly from rights conveyed to certificated public school employees in Title 14. These rights, as listed below, differ in areas ranging from union selection to mandatory payment of dues:

1. The selection of unions (or bargaining agencies) - A major difference between PERA and Title 14 is in the area of union certification. PERA involves the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA) in selecting and certifying union representation rather than local school boards. If there is a request for union representation; ALRA, not the school board, conducts an election by secret ballot.

2. Mediation - Another difference is the process of mediation. Under PERA, when labor and management negotiating teams reach a deadlock, they can mutually select a mediator or request that ALRA appoint a mediator. The mediator tries to work with the two parties to resolve any open issues.

3. Unfair Labor Practices (ULPs) - PERA also conveys additional rights that were not mentioned in Title 14. One right under PERA is that neither the public employer or public employees may engage in ULPs. PERA defines what constitutes a ULP and assigns ALRA with the responsibility of investigating and adjudicating ULP charges. ALRA can try to help resolve ULP issues between the two parties informally or can go through a formal hearing process in accordance with the Administrative Procedures Act. ALRA has the power to issue and serve orders to stop prohibited practices or to apply for an injunction from superior court. In order to reach its decision on ULPs, ALRA has the power to subpoena witnesses. ALRA can dismiss unfounded ULP allegations.

4. Dues deduction - PERA also conveys the right to employees to bargain for an agency shop and to have union dues deducted from employees' payroll and conveyed to the representative union.

PERA was not automatically made applicable to all employers. Under the 1972 legislation, political subdivisions were allowed to "opt out" of PERA and substitute their own labor relations provisions. Some subdivisions, most notably the Municipality of Anchorage, opted out of PERA.

Judicial decisions further define public school employees' rights

The requirements and application of Title 14 were further defined by two Alaska Supreme Court decisions. The first decision was in the case of the Kenai Peninsula Borough School District v. Kenai Peninsula Education Association, 572 P.2d 416 (Alaska 1977), commonly referred to as "Kenai '77" (see inset on page 11). In its decision, the court established what items were negotiable and what issues were non-negotiable in the collective bargaining process between teachers and school districts.

In the second case, Anchorage Education Association v. Anchorage School District, 648 P.2d 993 (Alaska 1982), referred to as the "Anchorage Strike Case" (see inset at right), the court ruled that teachers did not have the right to strike. These two court cases helped provide interpretation and guidance on items that had not been specifically addressed by the 1970 legislation.

ALASKA SUPREME COURT RULES TEACHERS HAVE NO RIGHT TO STRIKE

In 1979, school teachers in Anchorage went on strike. When they had not completed contract negotiations that year by the first day of school, they decided to walk out of classes. The strike lasted five days until the state superior court issued a temporary restraining order halting the walkout. The teachers then appealed the restraining order.

In the case, Anchorage Education Association v. Anchorage School District, 648 P.2d 993 (Alaska 1982) the supreme court ruled that the teachers did not have the legal right to strike. The court held that PERA did not pertain to teachers, even though AS 23.40.200 (d) lists public school employees as falling under its provisions.

The courts ruled that the statute referred to public school employees other than teachers, such as principals and counselors. The courts held that if the legislature had wanted PERA and its strike provisions to apply to teachers, it would have specifically so stated.

The decision went on to say, "No court has held that the common law permits public employees to legally strike in the absence of explicit statutory consent." Another reason cited by the court for their decision was the absence of an established oversight agency for the teachers, under the provisions of Title 14, which the court observed has historically contributed to the fairness of strikes.

Although the court admitted that teachers were not being treated the same as other public employees who were covered by PERA, it added that, unequal treatment is permissible if it is substantially related to the legitimate purposes of the legislation. The court observed in making its ruling that apparently the legislature felt Title 14 adequately provided cooperative labor relations for teachers.

Employees resent imposed contracts

Prior to 1990, public school employees were growing increasingly frustrated with their inability to bring closure or "finality" to the bargaining process. Under Title 14 and the accompanying court decisions, school districts had the right to impose a contract when collective bargaining impasse was reached. Public school employees had no formal means to respond to a contract imposition since they did not have a legal right to strike.

Despite not having the right to strike, teachers have been effective in using informal means to get imposed contracts lifted and have both sides return to the negotiations.

Informal means used by teachers have consisted of picketing their school district, filibustering school board meetings, taking votes to have an illegal strike, and working to their contract. When certificated staff work to their contract, they put in exactly their workday hours, but no more. This means that papers may not be graded and extracurricular activities for students may be curtailed. While effective, the informal means were long and drawn out and led to increasingly poor relations between the staff and school district.

KENAI '77 CASE DEFINES NEGOTIABLE ITEMS

In the mid 1970s, the Kenai School district filed suit against the local teachers union. The district sought a ruling from the courts regarding what items were negotiable and what items fell within the district's powers and responsibilities to make final decisions on policies. The school board claimed that while employment-related issues were subject to bargaining, items that affected educational policy should not be subject to bargaining. The union contended that district policy was a proper subject for collective bargaining.

In ruling on the case in 1977 [Kenai Peninsula Borough School District v. Kenai Peninsula Education Association, 572 P.2d 416 (Alaska 1977)], the Alaska Supreme Court observed that under the general law concerning bargaining between labor unions and private employers, the "scope of negotiable issues is broad." However, the court said that when the public employment sector is concerned, "and particularly education, the question of what is properly bargainable is thrown into more doubt." The courts expressed concern that the autonomy of school boards could be gradually eroded by the collective bargaining process over time.

In deciding the case, the Alaska Supreme Court quoted a passage from an United States Supreme Court decision that stated,

> Whether a teachers' union is concerned with salaries and fringe benefits, teacher qualifications and in-house training, pupil-teacher ratios, length of schoolday, student discipline, or the content of the high school curriculum, its objective is to bring school board policy and decisions into harmony with its own views.

The court held that while school boards are required to negotiate in good faith, school boards are not required or permitted to delegate decision-making to unions. The court stated, "a matter is more susceptible to bargaining the more it deals with the economic interests of employees and the less it concerns professional goals and methods."

While observing that it would be helpful if the legislature would provide more specific guidance on what items may be negotiated (see Recommendation No. 2 in this report), the court made a decision of what collective bargaining items are negotiable and which are non-negotiable.

The court then went on to list more than 30 items that could be bargained by the union and then listed nine items that it felt were nonnegotiable policy items:

1) relief from non-professional chores,
2) class size and teacher load,
3) an Ombudsman for teachers,
4) evaluation of administrators,
5) use and number of Teacher Aides,
6) use and number of Para-Professionals,
7) pupil to teacher Ratio Formula,
8) use of specialists, and
9) the school year calendar.

Binding arbitration considered one method of achieving finality

Public school employees lobbied the legislature for a number of years to have a formal means to bring finality to their contract negotiations. The method preferred by the employees was binding arbitration (see glossary on page 7 for definition of binding arbitration).

School district administrators and school boards adamantly opposed binding arbitration. Administrators are opposed to binding arbitration because they felt it contributes to escalating personnel costs in other states where it is used. Administrators have also found that in many instances where they have gone to advisory arbitration, they have been the losers in the financial decision, suggesting they would fare no better if the arbitrator's rulings became binding.

Currently many school districts feel that they are constrained in what they can pay to employees because revenues are limited under the State's school foundation program. The legislature, to some extent, has recognized the validity of this viewpoint. In 1991, they provided 15 single-site school districts a total of $2,131,200 to supplement funding the districts under the foundation program.

School districts who have a taxing authority have found taxpayers unwilling to support additional property or sales taxes. While funding has not increased in recent years, costs for school districts have been rising. Some of the costs are uncontrollable, particularly rapidly increasing costs of the Teacher's Retirement System. School districts are concerned that if their employees have binding arbitration as the means to finality, salaries and benefits will be set at amounts that are impossible to fund.

1989's Senate Bill 15 attempts to resolve finality issue

In this background of public school employee frustration with the provisions of Title 14 and school district concerns about binding arbitration, Senate Bill 15 was introduced in January 1989. The original version of the bill made substantial changes to Title 14. It included giving the ALRA oversight responsibilities for union elections and a provision of "last-best-offer" mediated arbitration that would be binding on both parties. The bill was altered substantially as it moved through the Senate. The revisions continued as the bill moved from the Senate to the House for consideration. In one committee version of the bill, public school employees were placed under the provisions of PERA as class (a)(2) employees with a limited right to strike followed by binding arbitration.

To avoid having binding arbitration imposed, two organizations that represent school boards and school administrators, the Alaska Association of School Boards and the Alaska Council of School Administrators, respectively, agreed to drop their opposition to the bill. Their agreement was predicated on the bill containing a right to strike [or (a)(3) PERA status] for teachers and other school personnel rather than binding arbitration [(a)(1) or (a)(2) PERA status].

These two organizations and the National Education Association-Alaska (NEA-Ak), representing teachers and other school employees, reached an agreement on a bill that would classify public school employees under PERA as class (a)(3) employees. Such classification would give them the right to strike. The House Finance Committee version of the bill reflected the agreement reached between the three interested organizations. However, the bill was changed when it reached the House Rules Committee.

House Rules Committee add a repeal date clause

The House Rules Committee passed out legislation that would make the reclassification of school district employees under PERA effective for only two years. At the end of the two-year period, the employees would again be subject to the provisions of Title 14 unless the legislature acted to extend their coverage under PERA. There was expressed intent for the two years to serve as a trial period. One representative stated that he viewed the "legislation as an experiment in finality in collective bargaining," and that he "hoped it would put a stop to the charges and counter charges seen on both sides of this issue." SB 15, as passed out of the House Rules Committee, placed public school employees under PERA as class (a)(3) workers for a two-year period.

SB 15 was then revised again on the floor of the House. An amendment, characterized as a "technical amendment" prohibited school districts from opting out of the bill. The amendment addressed concerns that since the original passage of PERA in 1972 allowed political subdivisions to "opt-out," school boards might argue that they should be entitled to the same option. The amendment was intended to clarify the intent of the legislature that the law would apply to all school districts. Senate Bill 15 as passed by the House and Senate, was signed into law by the Governor with an effective date of June 22, 1990.

REPORT CONCLUSIONS

The Legislative Budget and Audit Committee directed that we review and report on the impact of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA) on various aspects of labor relations between public school employees and the State's 54 school districts. We based our report conclusions on the information that we gathered through interviews with education organization groups, school district administrators, and members of local unions representing both certificated and noncertificated staff. We also relied on the results of a questionnaire we mailed to 51 school districts. We received a response from 38 or 75% of districts polled.

Length of time involved in negotiations has generally remained unchanged

There has been no significant consistent change in the length of time it takes to negotiate a contract under the provisions of PERA compared to Title 14. The issues being negotiated and the amount of available funding have more of an impact on the time spent bargaining than does the process used. Eighteen school districts responding to our survey reported that the length of time to negotiate a contract remained the same under PERA as it had under Title 14. Eleven districts reported that they either had not negotiated under PERA and therefore had no basis to form an opinion or that they simply had no opinion. Eight respondents felt that the length of time had increased while one respondent felt that the length of time had decreased.

Union members generally reported that the length of time to negotiate a contract had not changed much under PERA, but they felt that the productivity of negotiation meetings had been greatly enhanced. They attributed this change to the presence of the unfair labor practice (ULP) process which kept both union and management aware of the need to bargain honestly and in good faith.

Legal service costs at the district level generally not affected

Local unions reported that they have not experienced an increase in legal costs, while 27 (71%) of school districts also report no increase in legal costs. Local unions typically have not hired attorneys to either negotiate on their behalf or to act in legal disputes. Instead, any local union which is a party to an ULP charge or court case is assessed $10.00 for each local member and the state branch of the union pays the balance of the legal cost. The National Education Association (NEA), which represents most education employees in Alaska, report that they have had only a minimal increase in legal costs due to ULPs.

We found a total of $245,000 had been spent by school districts on legal costs in response to PERA; $120,000 paid by Alaska Association of School Boards (AASB) and $125,000 paid by individual school districts. AASB stated that they had just hired a $120,000 labor relations attorney to assist their member school boards in labor matters. Among the 11 (29%) school district respondents who reported an increase in legal costs, eight reported the increase was due to negotiations and six reported the increase was due to preparations for a ULP. We contacted the three school districts who had gone all the way to the hearing process with a ULP. One school district indicated they had hired their own in-house attorney in response to a ULP. They have budgeted $100,000 for that position. The second school district would not offer an exact estimate but said the amount was immaterial. The third school district stated they had spent about $9,000 in preparation for a ULP. In addition to school districts who had legal costs as a result of a ULP, another school district stated they had paid $16,000 for an attorney-prepared presentation for their school board and in preparation of upcoming negotiations.

The Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA) also has costs that are attributable to the time they spend investigating and hearing ULP charges. Since they do not have a system to keep track of the time spent on each case, we chose to allocate ALRA's FY 91 expenditures based on the number of education-related cases handled compared to the total number of cases filed with the agency. Based on this method, ALRA has spent an estimated $35,000 to investigate and hear education ULP cases.

Use of professional negotiators has remained about the same

We did not find any increase in costs to school districts attributable to hiring a professional contract negotiator. Of the 38 school districts responding to our survey, 8 (21%) hire either a consultant or an attorney to negotiate on their behalf. Of those, three had not yet negotiated a contract under PERA, and one reported that their negotiation costs remained the same. Of the remaining four who use a hired consultant or attorney, one had already reported an increase in costs under the legal services previously discussed. The other three districts reported no increase in their negotiator's fees.

We found no school district which had decided to use a hired negotiator when it had not used one previously, as a result of being placed under the provisions of PERA. Since there has been no significant change in the length of time it takes to negotiate a contract under PERA, it seems reasonable that the costs to negotiate those contracts would not alter significantly. Also, many negotiators receive a fixed fee for their services irrespective of the length of time it takes to reach settlement or the results of the settlement.

The major difference with PERA are the issues being negotiated

The major difference in negotiations and contract settlement under PERA is the nature of the issues being negotiated. With the passage of PERA, there is a lot of uncertainty on the part of both administrators and unions about what can be negotiated in collective bargaining. Both parties are unsure if the items listed as non-negotiable in the Kenai '77 court decision still apply.

Some feel that the court case is now void since it pertained to Title 14. The National Education Association of Alaska (NEA-Ak) say that they have no plan to push for reconsideration of the issues dealt with in the Kenai '77 decision. However, individual local unions told us that they were raising previously non-negotiable items in their contract talks.

These reports were substantiated by six school districts which in their survey response related that previously non-negotiable items were being raised during bargaining. The most commonly addressed non-negotiable item being discussed is class size. Currently, ALRA is considering the negotiability of a specific issue whose status is unclear.

According to information provided by NEA-Ak, 31 negotiated contracts have been settled under the provisions of PERA. This total includes contracts for both certificated staff and support staff. Nine additional contracts are currently being negotiated and ten districts have not negotiated under the provisions of PERA. As of this time under PERA, there has been no contracts imposed on unions by the school districts nor have there been any union strikes against the school districts. Of the 37 school districts who responded to our questionnaire, only 3 (8%) said that they had gone as far as advisory arbitration to reach contract settlement.

Only 5 (13%) of our school district respondents felt they had conceded more in negotiations under PERA than they would have conceded under Title 14. When we contacted those school districts, we found that the concessions were in the way of contract language and the union classification of employees rather than of a direct financial nature.

When polled, only one school district said that being under PERA was an improvement over being under Title 14. The one district that preferred PERA thought the law provided more clearly defined ground rules for labor relations. There were 31 (82%) school districts who felt that being under PERA was a disadvantage because of increased bureaucracy. They also did not like the potential for ULPs and strikes.

ALRA role has involved delay and has been less extensive than originally envisioned

While ALRA has had some involvement in school district labor relations, the amount of contact has been less than what was originally anticipated by the ALRA hearing examiner. The hearing examiner said that while she had expected up to 50% of ALRA cases to involve education issues, in actuality, less than 25% of ALRA's cases have been education-related.

According to ALRA's administrative hearing examiner, the small percentage of education cases can be attributed to two factors. One factor is that not every school district has negotiated a contract under PERA; therefore, ALRA has had jurisdiction over only some of the State's 54 school districts. A second factor is that both education unions and school districts are just learning about PERA and how ALRA is available to answer questions and hear issues.

There has been some frustration expressed by the education unions and school district administrators over the length of time involved in the ALRA hearing process. Two of the education cases that have advanced to the hearing process have taken as long as eight months to one year for a decision from the ALRA board.

One reason for the delay in case resolution is that ALRA, as it is currently organized, was formed only nine days after the effective date of Chapter 180, SLA 1990. And there has been a turnover of board members since that time. Executive Order No. 77 combined the labor relations functions of three separate entities under the one agency -- ALRA. There was a period immediately following this when offices were being moved, furnished, and staffed. Shortly after the agency was settled in and ready to work effectively, a new administration replaced the board members with new appointees. Because of these changes, ALRA has not had full opportunity to become as effective as originally envisioned by the legislature when they placed school employees under PERA.

ALRA has received favorable comments for its advisory role and mediation function

In spite of the frustration over delays in issuing decisions on ULPs, there have been many positive comments about ALRA. Union members and school district administrators who have contacted ALRA report that there is a considerable body of knowledge about labor relations at the agency. They have found ALRA to be a reliable, unbiased source of information. The comment was also frequently made that despite the length of delay at ALRA it is still a faster alternative than going to court to get a decision. It is significant to note that ULPs can be, and are being, filed by school districts almost as often as by unions.

ALRA's 15 education cases involve union certifications, regulations, and ULPs

The table on the opposite page summarizes ALRA's 15 education related cases. Eight of the cases involve ULP allegations (the sidebar on the right explains the types of cases filed at ALRA other than ULPs). Only three of the ULP allegations went to a final hearing. The other five ULP allegations either have been resolved by mutual consent of the two parties, dismissed by ALRA, or suspended pending completion of contract grievance procedures.

ALRA HANDLES OTHER CASES BESIDES ULPs

Union representation is the subject of three petitions filed at ALRA. Representation petitions are requests by unions that they be recognized as the bargaining agent for a group of employees.

Unit clarifications are the content of two of the cases filed at ALRA. Unit clarifications deal with which school district employees are considered confidential and therefore are prohibited from joining a union because of their access to management information.

Amendment to a unit certification is one case filed at ALRA. This case involves an agreement between two local unions and the school district regarding the merger of the two bargaining groups.

Regulatory request is one of the filed actions at ALRA. This case results from a petition from a local union requesting ALRA define in regulation their concept and approach of advisory arbitration.

The one case that has gone to the hearing process and has had a decision rendered was a case filed by the Classified Employees Association v. Matanuska-Susitna Borough School District. This case is of particular interest because the school district raised the question "When the terms of a collective bargaining agreement that pre-dates application of the PERA conflicts with the Act, does the agreement or the Act govern?" In this particular instance, the collective bargaining agreement that was being questioned had been negotiated under Title 14 and not under PERA. The school district believed that any definitions of confidential employees in PERA would not apply since it had a preexisting agreement. The classified employees association felt that the PERA definition was applicable.

In their decision based on the hearing, ALRA said they did not perceive any conflict between PERA and the agreement; therefore, ALRA could reach a decision on the case without addressing the question of which would apply in the event there was a conflict. After ALRA decided that they could determine whether certain employees were designated as confidential,the issue was subsequently converted to a unit clarification petition by mutual consent of the two parties.

ALRA is still considering two ULPs as of the date of this report. Both cases have gone to a hearing and a decision is pending; one case has been open for eight months and the other case has been open for a year and three months. The first case deals with a school district that refused to open negotiations with the certificated employees association when notice of intent to bargain was received one day late.

The second pending ALRA ULP case is of considerable interest because it deals with an item that was considered as negotiable in the "Kenai '77" court case. The school district filed the case against their local education association. The school district argued that while they have to bargain procedural requirements on voluntary transfers, they do not have to bargain substantive criteria. The education association responded that the wording in the contract that the district is questioning has been there for years and is clearly a permissible subject to bargain. When ALRA makes their decision on this case, it could be the first step in defining how the "Kenai '77" court case applies to PERA.

Unions feel that playing field is level, administrators prefer Title 14 process

The general attitude of public school employees is that while they would prefer to have binding arbitration as their means to finality, they find having the right to strike an acceptable alternative. Public school employees said there has been a perceptible change at the negotiating table now that they are under the provisions of PERA. There is a feeling that PERA has brought equality to the two sides and that more serious negotiations are now taking place. The phrase used most often by education personnel is that PERA "has levelled the playing field." Education personnel say that neither side has the upper hand in negotiations; school districts can impose and school personnel can strike. They also say that the knowledge of either side being able to file ULPs has made each side less likely to resort to "game-playing" in the negotiation process.

The general attitude of school district administrators is a great deal more mixed. On their responses to the questionnaire, only 3 (8%) of the administrators felt that it would become a common practice for teachers in their district to go on strike. Yet, 28 (74%) of the respondents said that they would prefer to have their employees return to Title 14, and 29 (76%) said they were opposed to having their employees remain in PERA with a class (a)(3) classification.

When questioned in person, the respondents had attitudes that were different than those reflected in the survey. Some school district administrators said that in public they will support the position expressed by the Commissioner of Education and by their individual school boards, but their personal feeling was different. Many school district administrators stated that it is acceptable to them if public school employees remain under the provisions of PERA as class (a)(3) employees. School administrators consistently remain strongly opposed to binding arbitration for their employees, but they find the right to strike an acceptable compromise.

AUDITOR COMMENTS

School district experience with PERA has been limited by two-year trial period

Because of the cyclical nature of school district contracts, not every district has had the opportunity to negotiate under the provisions of PERA during the eighteen months prior to the time of our review. Twenty percent of the school districts have not yet begun to negotiate a contract under the provisions of PERA.

Further, since the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA) was reorganized essentially at the same time that school district personnel came under PERA, that agency has not had the opportunity to fully demonstrate its effectiveness in overseeing school district labor relations. All unfair labor practice (ULP) charges must be settled before the two parties can proceed to the next step of the negotiation process. Since ULP charges for one district have been open for more than a year, contract negotiations have been stalled.

Despite the limited period involved, we believe PERA's impact on public school employees has been beneficial enough to warrant recommending that employees remain classified under AS 23.40.200 as (a)(3) employees (see Recommendation No. 1 in the Findings and Recommendation section of this report). However, if the legislature is still unsure about the benefits and impact of PERA, we would recommend extending the provisions of Chapter 180, SLA 1990 at least another three years and as many as six in order to provide more historical experience for setting public policy in this area.

A right to strike does not necessarily lead to strikes

Even though there has been no strikes since the Anchorage School District court decision, we were told that provisions of Title 14 should not be considered as having prevented strikes. Individuals experienced with school district labor relations in both Alaska and other parts of the United States, reported that statutory prohibitions against strikes did not necessarily prevent them from happening. One example cited was the State of Michigan, where teachers often strike illegally despite statutory prohibitions.

In our interviews with school employees, we were told that in the past illegal strikes were often a very real possibility in some communities. In several instances where a school district had imposed a contract on their employees, votes had been conducted for illegal strikes. We were told by different employee unions that conducted strike votes, that from 70% to 100% of their members had voted for illegal strikes in the past. In these instances, strikes had been avoided when the school district administration heard about the results of the strike vote and agreed to return to negotiations.

Just as not having a right to strike does not prevent strikes, having that right does not necessarily cause strikes. Strikes are caused by high labor expectations and low funding available to management and administrators to meet those expectations. We were told by many individuals from both labor and management that strikes occur when the collective bargaining system breaks down. Nobody makes the decision to go on strike, lightly. Everyone acknowledges that strikes are very disruptive to a community.

In small, rural communities employees fear for their personal safety if they were to go on strike. According to labor representatives, having the right to strike actually forces them to weigh how serious they are about items under negotiation. They must continually evaluate if the issues involved are important enough to them that they would rather strike than settle. As disruptive as all strikes are, illegal strikes are potentially even more disruptive. Most often illegal strikes take place in situations where there is no labor relations oversight agency such as the ALRA to moderate and oversee the situation.

Major benefit of PERA is not the right to strike, but in changes of attitude

Since public school employees are neither more nor less likely to go on strike by having the right to strike, then the real benefit of being under PERA is the perceived attitude change. All public school employees who spoke to us felt they had been patronized when negotiating under AS 14.20.500. In their view, both sides now recognize that there is an equality of power at the negotiating table. Public school employees feel that being under PERA offers additional benefits, such as oversight by ALRA, a more clearly defined negotiating process, and the right to bargain for a standard assessment of dues and fees.

Public school employees includes more than teachers

It is important to note that Chapter 180, SLA 1990 affected not just certificated staff but also non-certificated personnel. Non-certificated staff includes secretaries, bookkeepers, maintenance workers, and other public school employees. Prior to 1990, when the definition section of PERA excluded teachers from the provisions of PERA, it also was interpreted as excluding all non-certificated staff.

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Recommendation No. 1

Public school employees should remain under the provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), classified as (a)(3) employees.

Chapter 180, SLA 1990 contained an automatic repeal provision of two years. The effect of this repeal clause would be to again subject the labor relations for public school employees to the provisions of AS 14.20, Article 6, if no legislative action is taken.

In our view, the legislation should be enacted to lift the two-year repeal provision that was originally part of Chapter 180, SLA 1990. We further suggest that public school employees remain classified as (a)(3) employees, entitled to a right to strike after submitting to advisory arbitration, as provided for under PERA (AS 23.40).

Returning public school employees to the provisions of AS 14.20.550 would result in treating the largest public employment occupational group differently than all other public employees. In our view, this would be inconsistent with the legislature's previously established public policy in this area. AS 23.40.070 states in part that > ...The legislature further finds that the enactment of positive legislation establishing guidelines for public employment relations is the best way to harness and direct the energies of public employees eager to have a voice in determining their conditions of work, to provide a rational method for dealing with disputes and work stoppages, ... The legislature declares that it is the public policy of the state to promote harmonious and cooperative relations between government and its employees and to protect the public by assuring effective and orderly operations of government.

Other public employees covered by the provisions of PERA have the means to conclude negotiations through either binding arbitration or the right to strike. AS 14.20, Article 6, as currently written, does not provide public school employees such a method to achieve finality. Under this statute school districts had the right to, and did, impose employment contracts on teachers. In testimony before the Senate Labor and Commerce committee and in interviews with us, teachers reported that imposed contracts cause severe morale problems. In the past, imposed contracts have reduced wages and benefits and have pushed teachers to consider calling illegal strikes. Such circumstances do not suggest to us that AS 14.20, Article 6 promoted harmonious and cooperative relations between the school districts and its employees.

PERA has promoted harmonious and cooperative relations

As discussed in the Auditor Comments section, we recognize that two years has not provided an adequate trial period for all aspects of the legislation. However, we feel that it has been a sufficient period to show that PERA has successfully worked for public school employees. Based on our interviews with school district personnel, administrators, and the responses to our survey, on balance we feel that the 1990 legislation did promote harmonious and cooperative relations between school district personnel and administration.

It was widely conceded that teachers have more bargaining power under PERA than under Title 14. However, few school districts that reached agreement under the statute's provisions reported that they felt they had made major financial concessions. Although almost all districts responded that they favored a return to Title 14, from our interviews we felt this was because the district's enjoyed the wide degree of discretion and latitude provided by the statute rather than out of concern that they were at a great negotiating disadvantage under PERA.

Presence of Alaska Labor Relations Agency also beneficial

In our view, another aspect of PERA that promotes both cooperative labor relations and good faith bargaining is the jurisdictional role of the Alaska Labor Relations Agency (ALRA). Although as we report in the Auditor Comments and Report Conclusion sections, ALRA has in some respects been slow to respond to the demands of the education community; we feel that its structure and approach are of great potential benefit. Placing public school employees back under the provisions of Title 14 as currently written, will eliminate this important benefit of PERA.

AS 14.20, Article 6 has not promoted harmony or cooperative relations between school districts and its employees. There had been a growing frustration on the part of employees, prior to the 1990 legislation, with the labor relation provisions of Title 14.

These employees had been lobbying the legislature for fifteen years for a means to resolve their dissatisfaction. PERA status and classification as (a)(3) employees under AS 23.40.200 does represent a compromise that, for the most part, has satisfied school district employees. We anticipate that if school district employees are returned to the labor relations provisions of AS 14.20, the lobbying effort will begin anew. In our view, the legislature made an important step towards settling public policy in this area with passage of Chapter 180, SLA 1990. To return public school employees to Title 14 after the two year trial period would not be in the State's best interests.

Laws applicable to school employees and other public employees should be more alike

In their ruling on the Anchorage strike case (see inset on page 10), a majority of the Alaska Supreme Court presumed that the legislature had a public policy purpose for classifying teachers differently than other public employees. The court felt that absence of an oversight agency, no specific mention of teachers in PERA, and a lack of a clear right to strike under Title 14 was indicative of the legislature's desire to treat teachers differently. However, in our view the placement of teachers in Title 14 compared with statutory declaration of policy contained in AS 23.40.070 is inconsistent. Besides the language of AS 23.40.070, we are also persuaded by the observations of Chief Justice Rabinowitz, who wrote in a dissenting opinion in the Anchorage strike case that

> If public school teachers are so essential to society that they must be denied the right to strike then they should also be given the right to compulsory arbitration. On the other hand, if teachers are not so essential as the 'critical' employees then they should enjoy the same limited strike rights given to other 'semi-critical' public employees.

In line with Chief Justice Rabinowitz's reasoning, we believe that retaining public school employees under PERA is in the best interests of the State and more consistent with previously established public policy in the area of public employee labor relations.

Recommendation No. 2

If certificated public school employees remain subject to the provisions of PERA, the legislature should consider adopting legislation to clarify what issues are negotiable.

When the legislature first developed labor relations statutes for teachers in 1970, it provided that nothing in the law be construed as an abrogation or delegation of the legal responsibilities, powers, and duties of the school board including its right to make final decisions on policy (AS 14.20.610). As observed by the courts in the Kenai '77 case, to a degree this statutory provision conflicts with the requirements of AS 14.20.550 that districts bargain with employees regarding their employment and professional duties.

Admittedly, in view of the emphasis that state public policy has traditionally placed on local control of schools, this conflict between employee rights and board prerogatives is difficult to resolve. As discussed on page 11, the Alaska Supreme Court made its distinctions about what they thought could be negotiated without abrogating the local board's legal authority over policy. However, the courts did so rather reluctantly, stating in their decision that it would be helpful if the legislature, through future enactments, provided more specific guidance on a number of the items which the unions seek to negotiate.

At the present time under PERA, there is even more uncertainty on the part of public school employees and administrators as to what issues are subject to negotiation. It is uncertain under PERA if the guidelines set down in the Kenai '77 case still apply. We suggest the legislature should assess this situation and consider legislation that sets out negotiable issues as compared to the policy prerogatives of local school boards. If the legislature does not address this issue, then it is most likely that future decisions regarding negotiable items will be made either by ALRA or again by the courts.

APPENDIX A

RESULTS OF SCHOOL DISTRICT SURVEY

Listed below are 20 questions on the topic of moving teachers into class (a)(3) of PERA. This classification change gave teachers the right-to-strike. This classification allows both teachers and school boards to file Unfair Labor Practice charges with the Alaska Labor Relations Agency. Another effect of this change is that the Alaska Labor Relations Agency certifies union elections.

RE: Audit Control Number 05-4419-92

Dear Mr. Welker:

This is a reply to your preliminary audit report, "Impact of the Public Employment Relations Act on Local School Districts", dated November 8, 1991. The Department has reviewed the findings and recommendations and provides the following response:

Recommendation No. 1

Public school employees should remain under the provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), classified as (a)(3) employees.

The Department does not concur with Recommendation No. 1. Clear direction for negotiations between local school boards and unions was established by Title 14 and further defined by two Alaska Supreme Court decisions as referenced in the audit report. Placement of public school employees under PERA (AS23.40) has the effect of re-opening issues previously set by past practice and the court decisions. Having a right to strike does not necessarily cause strikes. Under any circumstance, teacher strikes are not good for students.

Local school boards have lost their authority to negotiate evenly with unions under Title 23, and prefer, as evidenced by your report, to negotiate under Title 14. Yet the "opt out" provision which applies to municipalities is denied to school districts. Teachers have achieved and maintained the highest average teacher salaries in the nation under Title 14, and as such have not suffered at the hands of local boards. According to the September 1991, Institute of Social and Economic Research (ISER) report to the legislature, "salaries for many Alaska teachers remain substantially higher than national averages". In fact, "The average fiscal year 1989 teacher's salary and benefits cost the school district $50,000 in Anchorage, $53,000 in Fairbanks, and $58,000 in Juneau. Using ISER Anchorage/U.S. and McDowell's (1988) within Alaska differentials, these salaries are 22 percent, 24 percent, and 37 percent higher, respectively, than the U.S. average of $36,000." The report does indicate that teacher salary schedules and total compensation varies throughout the State. However, due to local control, "the difference reflects to some extent different attitudes about encouraging teachers to remain and make a commitment to the community."

SB 15 should be allowed to sunset in order to return to a system which has overwhelming local support and interpretation and guidance established by the court.

Recommendation No. 2

If certificated Public School Employees remain subject to the provisions of PERA, the Legislature should consider adopting legislation to clarify what issues are negotiable.

The Department does not concur with Recommendation No. 2. SB 15 should sunset due to the many uncertainties associated with public school employees remaining under PERA as (a)(3) employees.

Other provisions such as 2-year tenure, rehire, dismissal, non-retention, and teacher retirement which are related to total compensation and employment security are already provided for under Title 14 or have been granted by the Legislature.

Sincerely,

Jerry Covey

Dear Mr. Welker:

Thank you for providing NEA-Alaska with a copy of the "CONFIDENTIAL" PRELIMINARY REPORT ON:

"IMPACT OF THE PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS ACT ON LOCAL SCHOOL DISTRICTS."

We find the Report extremely comprehensive, thorough, and precise in its attention to the detail which pertains to the various nuances of the public school district collective bargaining process. LB & A staff are to be commended for this energetic effort.

We are also gratified to learn that LB & A intends to supplement the Report with a survey of public school employee bargaining agent union presidents, similar to the survey of superintendents. The results of this particular survey will bring more balance and broadened insights.

It is appropriate to provide some brief comments on some components of the Report before responding to the specific recommendations.

> On page 5, in the third paragraph, the number of public school teachers in Alaska is probably understated by 700+.
> On page 7, it may be more accurate to say that impasse "may" exist after a mediator and advisory arbitrator have tried to resolve issues; and, is probably more accurately described when both parties acknowledge that they are unwilling to make further modification of their positions on the issues in dispute.
> On page 8, in the second paragraph, seldom, if ever, was an actual written report produced by the mediator under AS 14.20.550.
> On page 9, from our perspective, it is also appropriate to emphasize that PERA contains provision for finality through right to strike or binding arbitration as one of its significant differences from AS 14.20.550.
> On page 10, the conclusion in the third paragraph is somewhat general in nature and while it may be true in some instances, it is certainly not accurate to all districts and/or each round of negotiations in a district.
> On page 12, in the paragraph relative to school district taxing authority it may be more accurate to say there "may be a reluctance" rather than an "unwillingness" to support additional property taxes.

- Recent national polls in fact show that the general public is willing to pay more taxes for public schools and the recent school bond vote in Anchorage is indicative of their willingness to support the operation of schools.
- In the same paragraph, it should also be noted that teachers contribute 8.65% of their pay to the retirement system and that part of that cost increase is due to benefit improvements and the RIP.

> On page 21, in the second paragraph, settlement of a pending ULP is not necessarily a prerequisite for continuation of negotiations. Naturally, resolution of ULPs is desirable for the successful potential of the negotiations process.

> In the last paragraph on page 21 the reasons given for causing strikes are not the exclusive reasons although they are certainly contributing ones. The presence of unresolved ULPs and provocative and offensive conduct are frequently major contributing factors when employees strike.

RECOMMENDATION # 1: Public School Employees Should Remain Under the Provisions of the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), Classified as (a) (3) Employees.

NEA-Alaska agrees with this recommendation and will be working aggressively in the legislative process for the removal of the "sunset" provision from the current legislation. We will continue training programs for our members in better understanding of their rights and responsibilities under the PERA. We will seek its full implementation on behalf of all employees covered by it with a minimum of conflict and confrontation.

We will continue to work closely with the ALRA to facilitate their procedures and seek resolutions to problems and conflicts at the earliest administrative levels.

We will seek the opportunity for joint training and seminars with AASB and ACSA on our common concerns under the PERA. Pilot efforts in this regard in Anchorage and Fairbanks in the fall of 1990 were moderately successful.

RECOMMENDATION # 2: If Certificated School Employees Remain Subject to the Provisions of the PERA, the Legislature Should Consider Adopting Legislation to Clarify What Issues are Negotiable.

It is desirable to have clarity on the scope of negotiations and which issues are mandatory or permissive topics of negotiations. NEA-Alaska is confident that the "Kenai" decision will continue to provide a general frame of reference for the parties. However, over the extended period of time both circumstances and dynamics of process change.

The diversity and the magnitude of differences in public education in Alaska school districts may in fact require some flexibility in the articulation of mandatory and permissive subjects of negotiations. The policy responsibilities of school boards as employers will continue to provide sufficient guidance on disputes pertaining to negotiability.

There are two examples from the Kenai decision which may serve to emphasize the need for some flexibility in definition over the extended period and because of changing circumstances.

The Kenai decision makes class size a non-mandatory topic for negotiations because it is more in line with policy than with the economic interests of employees. However, increasing student enrollments, limited funding, reductions to student programs and services are just a few components which all contribute to significantly increasing class sizes, especially in urban areas. Administrators, school boards, employees and the general public are all interested in finding viable solutions to the problem.

Because a solution has not been found and because the problems continue to exacerbate it is becoming one of a "condition of employment" as well. Increasing class sizes increase negligence and liability potential, contribute to the possibility of increasing student discipline problems, mean more out of pocket employee expenses for classroom supplies and materials, contribute to an increased workload in homework, tests, preparation, and may constrain one's ability to achieve annual performance goals thereby contributing to possible negative annual evaluations. There is a point where the class size problem becomes a condition of employment and should be negotiable.

A similar scenario exists on the issue of employee workload, especially for rural secondary teachers who may be required to teach subjects out of their areas of certification. Again, adverse impacts on employee evaluations can be the direct result and a similar conclusion on negotiability is valid.

Thank you again for the opportunity to respond to the Preliminary Audit Report. I hope that our comments and recommendations are helpful to your process.

Respectfully submitted:
